

Big Five Personality Test Results

Openness: 50%

A score around 40 suggests a preference for familiar ideas and methods. You may be pragmatic, valuing tested approaches over novelty. While capable of adapting, you feel most comfortable with clear, concrete systems. You may excel in more structured and familiar environments such as project coordination, operations management, or financial advising, where tested methods are preferred.

Conscientiousness: 62%

A score around 60 reflects a healthy balance between structure and flexibility. You're dependable and efficient but not rigid. You plan ahead, stay focused, and can adapt when necessary. Ideal for roles that need responsibility without excessive rigidity. You may excel in careers like project management, marketing, or healthcare administration, where dependability and flexibility are both important.

Extraversion: 62%

A score around 60 means you're socially comfortable but not dependent on constant interaction. You enjoy people and conversation but also value time alone. You balance team engagement with focused work well. You may excel in socially balanced careers such as teaching, consulting, or human resources, where interaction and independent work are both valued.

Agreeableness: 65%

A score around 60 suggests you are generally warm and friendly, but also able to be assertive when needed. You work well with others and are trusted, but you can set boundaries and make hard decisions when required. You may excel in roles that balance cooperation with assertiveness, such as customer service management, team leadership, or corporate training.

Neuroticism: 66%

A score around 60 indicates moderate emotional reactivity. You may experience stress and anxiety but can usually manage it. You benefit from structured, empathetic environments. You may excel in careers that require managing some emotional stress with support, like graphic design, customer service, or teaching.
